Pottery and Pixels: New Ways to Teach the Forgotten Story of Free Blacks in Colonial America

A Summer Teachers Institute exploring the history and legacy of Free African American life in 18th-century Philadelphia. This five-day workshop combines the latest African American archeological results with new digital media technologies for inspiring students in the classroom.

August 8-12, 2016

(Workshop limited to 35 teachers)

Working with historians and archeologists at Independence Park, educators first gain hands-on practice in piecing together the lives of past citizens through the artifacts they left behind. Workshop participants then bring their expertise forward to collectively explore new ways of teaching this new history information using computer technology (courtesy of Drexel University's Westphal College of Media Arts & Design). This program facilitates instructor growth through deepened experience with primary evidence, 3D digital technology, and educator-driven learning experiences.

Cost: $100 (*due upon notification of acceptance into program)

Professional Development Credit Provided (Act 48 for PA teachers)

To apply, contact the IPI Education Program Manager at jeffrey_collins@nps.gov

- Participants receive and develop teaching resources and lesson plans.
- Behind the scenes tours to closely examine artifacts and historical documents.
- Lunch provided each day.
- Create artifact reproductions at the Clay Studio; Virtually visit the past using 3D computer technology
- Learn from, and network with, archeologists, historians, curators and teaching peers.

Here's what teachers from past Summer Institutes had to say about the experience:

"This is history that happened in our student's back yard... They need to be aware of this."

"This workshop was the best I have ever attended! Great job."

"A good balance between classroom/content sessions and on-site visits."
